Salkehatchie 2022

by Dane Waund

ommy Wilkes is a gifted preacher and musician, familiar to many at WSUMC. Our children got to experience a camp run by him, and I got to know him a bit too. Tommy's first Salkahatchie experience was at Penn Center (also familiar to many), and he runs his week in a similar manner.

The Bishopville camp is very well supported by local churches and industry. This year was clearly a heavy lift though, as the "normal" crew of regulars was reduced due to Covid concerns, primarily the immunization requirement. As a group of 37 campers, we worked to upgrade three homes and to join in fellowship with their owners. This was my third camp and without a doubt, the most challenging I've seen.

Darby and Wyatt worked on a stick-built home, occupied by Julius "Juju" McCants, and owned by his aunt Dorothy (Dot). Both were frequently at the home, actively participating. On Monday, a significant number of tools were stolen from the parking lot (all of Darby's), and during Wyatt's demo, it became apparent that key underpinnings of Juju's home were termite infested and needed replacement. A tough start. Following some progress Tuesday, the roof was stripped of shingles, and the tar paper was installed on Wednesday. Darby and three others were there late that afternoon to finish some small projects when an unexpected severe thunderstorm hit the site, overwhelming the tarps on the roof. The water flowed through the home, destroying most of the ceilings. During that evening's sharing session, Darby passionately described her feelings of failed responsibility while frantically trying to patch the roof with small tarps in the driving rain. She described sections of the ceiling falling below her while Aunt Dot was below watching her home essentially disintegrating in front of her. During the week, Wyatt apparently nearly fell off the roof once, put his foot through the ceiling once, and impressed everyone by cracking open a watermelon with a rusty crowbar. One of the adults on-site shared with me that on the final day, Wyatt helped Juju as he became more vocal later in the week, letting his personality show. Natalie also clearly gained confidence and became more self-directed as the week progressed, working closely with two new friends on the team, Mekdis and Anali. At the closing service, I was really impressed that she showed the self-confidence to step forward to speak a second time as our session neared its end. She wanted to be sure to show gratitude to two local Methodist adults who had worked with us closely on-site, providing and organizing materials. She walked confidently into the center of a circle of 40 people, picked up a microphone, and made sure others knew how important their contribution was.

A special feature of the camp was the "pairing" of a group of six youth from South America with our six who were on site. One of the children's mothers for an hour and a half, carefully placing all of Juju's furniture back into the home, repeatedly checking with him to be sure everything was just where he wanted it. Juju came to nearly every meal during the week and was one of two homeowners to attend our end-of-week communion ceremony — a first for Tommy's camp.

Lydia and Ava were assigned to the Wells home, a singlewide trailer with beautiful flowers in the yard. It appeared unusually well cared for during the camper's initial tour of homes. During the week, however, the home's hidden problems became apparent. Plumbing and septic waste issues had caused significant damage to the house's structure, particularly in the kitchen. Several times during the week the Wells team felt they had taken real steps forward, only to find a secondary problem that needed addressing. The team missed Ava's positive presence after Monday. Lydia worked with three of the camp's "core groups" from Red Bank, grizzled veterans who were extremely skilled, but were also more than a bit curmudgeonly. Bob, Mackie, and Cory all asked me to share with Lydia's parents what a strong worker she is. Mackie set her up to cut boards with a circular saw and noticed with admiration that she had a steadier hand than he does. Cory and Bob noted Lydia working steadily out in the rain to fashion the team's Salkehatchie cross, without prompting. Lydia also had to cope with homeowners who were less grateful than one would expect, prompting yet another lesson for campers on that team as they prepare for leadership and life.

Kirby, Natalie, and I were on the Don Anderson team, working to bring a dilapidated single-wide trailer into livable condition. Kirby impressed his team leaders, Luke and Vanessa, with this constant willingness to seek out work: "Mr. Dane, is there anything I can do to help right now?" And we were all really surprised when he took over the music playlist and got everyone jamming in the SUV during trips to and from the home. Given that we were struggling with a well, more than one person commented that Kirby's own "pump had been primed" had worked Salkehatchie as a youth. She brought her two children along with two other children, each from two other friends' families to the camp. During the week they clearly bonded, forming online groups as they tearfully bid goodbyes. Some of our youth will likely report personal invitations to visit South America. A Peru-based service week, using Salkehatchie as a model, was discussed over dinner.

Because of the problems in the homes, the weather and the smaller camp size, two of the three homes were "less finished" than their teams desired, even though we worked well into the evening several nights. Pastor Tommy spoke openly about the purpose of Salkehatchie during the week, stressing that certain objectives not being achieved should be considered one of the lessons the young people at the camps normally face. Let's all take a moment to thank our youth and to make sure they understand the impact of what they achieved, as each was very invested in improving these people's homes and lives.

Thanks for trusting me as the de facto chaperone on the trip. They would have been great without me.

Sunday School Updates
